RESEARCH INTERESTS

- Origins, development and problems of the legal aid in history. Legal aid is still considered one of the fundamental aspects of the right that every individual has to access to justice and to assert his claims in court. In the past, such a need was felt, albeit with various modulations, essentially as part of the charitable activity that a society founded on Christian values had to guarantee to the poor and the weak who were unable to defend themselves; the modalities in which this right was granted were however extremely varied and reflected a complexity of models often comparable to that of today. It is therefore of great interest to study the problems faced over the centuries to guarantee what is still considered a fundamental right of the individual.
- The evolution of speculative and corporate contracts in the history of commercial law. Commercial law, since its medieval "explosion", has always found her roots, more than any other branch of law, in the daily practice of trading, but has inevitably had to deal with and adapt to reality exogenous regulations (eg. the regulations of usury by canon law); for this reason the evolution of the contracts used by the merchants saw the use of significant legal creativity dose that is primarily seen in themes such as the limitation of liability or the development of speculative mechanisms.
- Law, environment and emergencies. The recent pandemic has brought out on the one hand the need for an immediate legal and regulatory response and on the other has however provoked numerous criticisms, mainly focused on the opportunity to proceed with significant limitations of constitutional rights by virtue of the opinions of a technical committee, still not sufficiently able to know in detail the mechanisms of the new Sars-CoviD-2. From this point of view, it is interesting to investigate what happened in the past in situations of a similar emergency profile.
- Protagonists and controversies in industrial law in the Piedmont area. The Industrial Revolution, which only came to Italy after the Second World War, was however anticipated in the so-called 'industrial triangle' (Piedmont, Liguria and Lombardy) as early as the end of the 19th century and therefore focused the attention of jurists, especially in these areas, on the new frontiers of economic law: protection of trade names and trademarks, regulation of inventions and industrial innovations, unitary understanding of the multiple activities of companies, regulation of competition, just to give a few examples. Piedmont, the home of many new industrial enterprises that were building their fortunes in the years between the 19th and 20th centuries (for Alessandria, the two famous hat factories, both under the name Borsalino, for Turin, Fiat, founded in 1899, and a wide range of machine-tool industries), it was also the site of the first teaching of Industrial Law (at the University of Turin), whose holder, Moisè Amar, was not only a well-known lawyer, involved in numerous disputes that became law at the time (such as the famous Verga-Mascagni case, Borsalino v. Borsalino and others), but also a qualified member of the sector's nascent international organisations and a prolific essayist. This figure has recently received some attention from historiography, but has not yet been fully explored in terms of a full reconstruction of his legal biography, which therefore appears to be the subject of an investigation that can no longer be postponed. Similarly to be investigated is the milieu of practitioners (especially lawyers, as Edoardo Bosio or Angelo Villa) who shared numerous judicial battles with him to protect the nascent rights of industry.
